Customer Reviews

Good review of the research evidence on the biological needs of infants for parental closeness and responsiveness, and the lifelong benefits to children of co-sleeping. Shows that the custom of infants sleeping alone is peculiar only to western cultures in the last several generations.

This book really opened my eyes to the benefits and normality of co sleeping. The only thing that I wished he emphasized, however, is the safety concern of bedsharing when the infant is being bottle fed. I'm not against it personally but if you see some of his interview videos (specifically the Fox news channel 6 report about bedsharing deaths in Milwaukee, WI) he states that he does not recommend bedsharing for infants not breastfeeding.

This book is very smart, evidence based and informative. If you intuitively feel "the cry it out method" goes against your natural disposition on your child rearing, which is the case for my husband and I, this book will be very supportive and encouraging if you choose to have a family shared bed. It's an important tool that can assist you in your decision to safely room-in or bed-share with your child.

I have been bed sharing with my baby, but because it was easier, rather than because it was the right thing to do. After being conflicted between my wanting to continue to bed share and Dr. Advice to move baby to his own bed, I decided to do some research and found this book. This reinforced my decision to continue to bed share and gave me a great resource to share with other parents, as well as some great talking points to discuss with my doctor.

Great book! I think it's great that finally there is scientific backing to something mothers have always done. Something that comes so naturally and was never questioned until recently by only a small part of the world. Thank you Dr. McKenna!!

This book is excellent. Written with responsibility and depth, it informs as to the science without forcing anything. The author respects and understands that each family is unique. Congratulations Mr. McKenna!

Perfect
