Samaipata: Bolivia's Megalithic Mountain

Synopsis

Located in the central high jungle of Santa Cruz Bolivia, El Fuerte De Samaipata is an astonishing ancient megalithic site that academics do not properly understand. They claim that a rather primitive stone age culture from the Basin carved elaborate niches and other features into the top of a red sandstone mountain about 2000 years ago, and then that the Inca occupied the location likely in the 15th century, adding their own buildings of mud and stone. The author, an expert of the megalithic sites located in Peru and Bolivia, shows clear evidence that these two cultures simply discovered the megalithic stone works at Samaipata, and that the original creators must have done their work long before 2000 years ago, and employed Lost Ancient High Technology.
